Or try to use the WinUnMount, which works well for me. Unmounting for non-removable media. If you unmount a removable device, Windows Explorer may say that "the disk drive cannot be unmounted because it is in use." This happens when you plug in or unplug the media. If you cannot unmount the removable media, see the section titled "Matching the Media Type" on page.

Problem: Two identical drives (in the same RAID-Z configuration) seem to have different UUIDs Cause: The UUIDs are automatically generated by Windows 7 (and, supposedly, Windows Vista, but I haven't checked this one in detail). You can read more about the UUID in the Windows 7 article at: Solution: Check the UUIDs on your drives with Disk Management and/or the Windows Event Viewer. See the following articles: Solution: Windows 7 thinks that two HDDs are the same For Windows 7, you can use the fixmbr tool to change the system files on the master boot record (MBR). Windows 7 will boot, but Windows Explorer will report that the drives are the same. The fixmbr option takes away the Windows 7 startup files (check the MBR for the Windows 7 system files) and replaces them with the Windows XP system files. Note: You should only replace the boot files in the main OS partition. Don't use the fixmbr tool to replace any files in the NTFS partitions. The boot files are stored in the System partition. Windows will boot into Windows XP. Solution: Make sure that a fixmbr and a fixboot are present. It is important to perform these fixes at the same time because if you attempt to run fixmbr or fixboot without a fixmbr present, Windows 7 will exit with an error. Warning: You must boot to Windows XP to run fixmbr. If the partition is damaged or the files are damaged, you will get an error that the fixmbr is not present. To repair a fixmbr, Windows 7 will need to run a repair installation, so you must boot to Windows 7. Solution: Use the FixBoot option. If you have an older version of Windows (such as 82157476af
